Thirty school districts in California have decided that the best way to counter the ill effects of mandatory high-stakes standardized testing in mathematics is to join together and institute their own performance assessments. The authors report that the districts participating in the Mathematics Assessment Collaborative have seen improved mathematical understanding on the part of both their students and their teachers.

Classification: D60

Keywords: achievement measurement; mathematical understanding; assessment; standardized testing; USA (California)